Thunder and Lightning

Lightning is a big flash of electricity. It is released during a storm. Lightning strikes more often in the summer than in the winter. That's because there are more storms in the summer. Sunny weather and hot temperature heat the air and make water evaporate. The hot air and water vapor rise into the sky. As they rise, they meet the cold air. The cold air makes the water vapor turn back into water droplets or ice crystals. That forms a cloud, the droplets and crystals carry a tiny bit of electricity. The electricity builds until lightning suddenly forms. Lightning is five times hotter than the sun. Lightning heats the air around it so quickly that the air explodes. Thunder is the noise we hear when the air explodes.
